Elektra, Op. 58, is a one-act opera by Richard Strauss, to a German-language libretto by Hugo von Hofmannsthal, which he adapted from his 1903 drama Elektra. The opera was the first of many collaborations between Strauss and Hofmannsthal. It was first performed at the Königliches Opernhaus in Dresden on 25 January 1909.

Herbert von Karajan's 1964 Salzburg Elektra has seen several incarnations on disc. I myself own a MELODRAM recording of the August 11 performance, recording which was pretty abysmal: thin and muffled sound, bad balance between orchestra and singers, no orchestral detail, Elektra is not quite as accessible as "Salome" but it is worth the effort; the hallmarks of Strauss are there, namely the rich viennese melodies (especially for the female voice) and the lush orchestration, but there is also an extra bite and ferocity.

Strauss's fourth opera and the first in which he collaborated with Hugo von Hofmannsthal on the libretto, `Elektra' is a psychological tour de force. The most modernist of his operas - Hofmannsthal referred to it as both "black and bright" - it verges on the atonal.

It may at first seem odd that a recording of Strauss ' Elektra should feature on the front cover the name and the photograph of the conductor and not of the soprano in the title role. And, after listening to the recording, it may seem odder still. This is not to say that conductor Semyon Bychkov isn't a superlative Strauss conductor.

Decca's Elektra is a remarkable account of the opera. Recorded in 1968, produced by John Culshaw with an all-star cast, this performance captures the opera's brutality and atmosphere of nearly uninterrupted hysteria. Georg Solti conducts the Vienna Philharmonic, one of the great Strauss orchestras, in a searing reading of the frenzied score. Solti's control of the opera's waves of tension and ...
